

Claims:

Whistle-blower rewards are owed from the Securities and Exchange Commission, The Federal Bureau of Investigation, The Government Accountability Office, The Auditor General of The U.S. Department of Energy, The Federal Trade Commission, The Office of the Special Counsel, The California Victims Assistance Board, The U.S. and California Attorney General's offices and other agencies that received valuable law enforcement and oversight assistance from "Victims Group A". Recently one of the peers of "Victims Group A" received a $5 million reward for whistle-blower evidence on the U.S. Department of Energy for exposing related cover-ups. The minimum average whistle-blower reward, to other parties, has previously averaged $1M per agency. Providing witnesses in this case have saved taxpayers over $1T (Trillion).

The attacks on witnesses and applicants used taxpayer financed government resources and cost the victims over $5B in damages based on industry comparative metrics and the published financial records, of the attackers, showing the attackers profits derived from re-directing victims money to themselves and their cronies and exploiting those funds for stock market profits.
